Question 1

After giving a talk to a group of midlife to older adults at your work place, a couple in their early 60s, Mr and Mrs Tan shared about their frustration with their two young adult children (aged 27 – a male, and 25 – a female). With a sigh of resignation, Mrs Tan said, “I really don’t understand what is going through their minds! I am feeling so upset and helpless!” Among others, Mrs Tan spoke about their children’s unwillingness to find a house of their own; the younger one still could not find a job but yet does not seem to be interested to do so. The eldest is currently working on some ad hoc engagement, no permanent job is in sight too. There is no mention of their intention to get married even though they have been in-and-out of relationships. At times they are behaving rather rude towards her and her husband. Mr Tan also complains that their children are not helping with their household bills, let alone giving any allowance to their mother. Thankfully Mrs Tan is still working part-time, and Mr Tan is still holding a job.

Based on this context, answer the following questions.

Question 1a

Examine Erikson’s theory on psychosocial crisis for the two adult children in the scenario above. Support your answer with clear examples.

(5 marks)

Question 1b

Identify and analyse the factors in physical, psychological and social developmental dimensions that may have contributed to the behaviours of the two young adults in the scenario. Support your answer with research studies.

(15 marks)

Question 1c

Discuss “emerging adulthood” and evaluate how this concept might be another contributing factor to the situation of the two young adult children in the scenario.

(20 marks)

Question 1d

Using the dual-focus approach discussed in class, propose a comprehension plan which you could share with your aunt in order to help her and her husband manage their young adults.

(10 marks)

Question 2

Define and examine the concept “multiple intelligence.” How is it different from the traditional concept of intelligence (IQ)? Give a brief overview and appraise the multiple intelligence theory proposed by Howard Gardner and Robert Sternberg. Evaluate how this idea (multiple intelligence) could contribute to your work with the middle and late childhood children in Singapore.

(30 marks)

Question 3

Appraise the concept ‘empty nest’ syndrome in relation to midlife adults. Hypothesise the implication of this phenomenon for the midlife adult couple, their children, and the community they are living in, citing research studies and examples.
